President Donald Trump. Private equity billionaire Paul Tudor Jones and financier Robert Wolf are in talks with the Democratic National Committee, according to people familiar with the discussions, as they continue to drum up cash ahead of the Feb. 3 Iowa caucuses. As the nation debates over Democratic presidential candidates, the centrist nature of the 2020 field may divide a key base of support from the party's progressive wing. But Wolf and Jones have made it clear they're willing to spend freely to get Clinton over the top. "I think that Hillary is a good candidate, and we all should give her the chance to come out on top," Wolf told The Post. "In the end, it's all about the Democratic Party, and obviously this is my party. I want the best outcome for my party." While the exact size of Jones's contribution is unclear, Wolf says he was represented by an attorney as he lobbied to persuade the DNC to tap him as a major donor. “I did not ask for special treatment,” Wolf says. “He (Jones) was very straightforward about it.” Wolf declined to disclose Jones’s exact contribution. But people familiar with the matter say it’s in the “eight-figure” range, according to one person familiar with the conversation. “You see billionaires giving to these things and making this stuff,” says former DNC chair Donna Brazile. “They’re a real concern about who’s going to get in this thing in a major way. They’re highly in the mix right now.” At least three other hedge-fund managers in the country, including the billionaire Thomas Steyer of San Francisco and the veteran investor John Doerr of Menlo Park, are also considering making major contributions to a party in what has traditionally been a cash-strapped political cycle. Wolf says he's particularly interested in helping to raise cash for Vice President Joe
