Surgical procedures involving artificial heart valves have become more common in recent years. Some have become quite routine and provide important benefits to patients. These include replacing diseased, leaking heart valves and replacing defective artificial heart valves, as well as heart valve repair. In many instances these valves, which are often implanted in young patients, are subject to problems such as calcification, lack of mobility, fibrin attachment to the valve, and fold deformation. There is a need to produce a valve that has a fabric outer fabric covering that is resistant to degradation in vivo and to a degree sufficient to delay or minimize the onset of thrombus formation on the device. There is a further need for a device that will minimize the incidence of thrombus formation on the device while being relatively easy to deploy in the field during surgery, and which may be used to treat an abnormality in the heart valve.
