The in-development DNSMark tool, which has been available for a few months now, will start beta testing this week. “What DNSMark lets you do is cache your DNS settings from a Windows host OS,” says Michael D’Arcy, the DNSMark project lead and a software engineer at Google. “You can have DNS serving different addresses over time, and when you login again you can't tell it's not your normal DNS server.” D’Arcy has been discussing DNSMark publicly with other IT administrators at Google and elsewhere for the last year. He has done beta testing for everyone in the past month, but the final public release will be available only to people already on the developer pre-release site. He estimates that around 200 people have tested this tool already. DNSMark will go live at the end of January. The first public beta of the tool will be released in early January. You can sign up now to be notified when DNSMark is open to testing. Windows, Mac and Linux users will be able to install DNSMark from the DNSMark
